Sea Serpents Are Superseded.

San Francisco Call: Meteors cutting wide swaths across the heavens are not uncommon sights at sea, but when the fiery bodies take to sailing up from the horizon, instead of adhering to the conventional course, they are out of the ordinary.

This phenomenon was witnessed by the officers and passengers of the Japanese liner America Maru, arriving yesterday from the Orient, on August 11, and those who saw the heavenly body come apparently out of the sea and shoot like a skyrocket upward across the vast void say they will never forget the sight.

It is no fairy tale, because Captain Alfred G. Stevens, the commander, is ready to back his passengers in the story.

"I have seen many celestial bodies at sea," said Captain Stevens, "but never anything like this. It was not long after dark that the meteor appeared down on the horizon in the northeast. To the great fiery head was attached a bright tail, which seemed to swing as the meteor moved up into the heavens, describing an arc of 40 degrees, and traveling slowly and not in a flash like shooting stars. It was a beautiful and awe-inspiring sight and one not to be forgotten."

The America Maru's log confirms the story with this entry, which will be sent to the astronomical department at Washington: "Time, 7:56 p. m.; position of steamer, 23 degrees latitude, 155 longitude. Large meteor rising from horizon bearing north 30 east (Mag.), north 11, east (true), and describing an arc 40 degrees, approximately, and disappearing to northwest."

Sailors Married Island Belles.

San Francisco Call: "All's well that ends well," agreed First Mate H. H. Hatfield and ten of the crew of the ill-fated bark Puritan, who arrived here yesterday on the royal mail steamer Aorangi from Papeete, Tahiti, in the wake of their skipper, Captain Chapman, who came up several weeks ago with full details of the disaster.

From the looks of the men it would never be supposed that but a short time ago they spent twelve days in an open boat on the burning bosom of the South Seas with little food and no water and the sharks ever ready to swallow the first delirious one that sought succor in the waste. All hands appeared to be in the pink of condition yesterday and they state that their trim shape is due to the fine treatment they received at the hands of the natives of the island of Anaa, on which they landed after sailing and rowing 1000 miles over the ocean.

"There's nothing wrong with them black-and-tans," said the mate, "and I thought I would never get any of the men to come away. Two of them—they were Harry Smith and Martin Peterson—remained at Tahiti. What do you think, a couple of dusky queens?"

got stuck on them and got them to marry them for a bunch of bananas and coconut plantations. We had the time of our lives after we landed at Anaa. The natives met us on the beach with open arms. They had not seen a white man in a long time and only a few of them could speak broken English, but they could tell we were up against it. I thought the men would kill themselves eating, and myself, too. They sat us down to a regular native feast with roast pig, cooked in a native oven in the sand on the beach, all kinds of tropical fruit and some great cake. We certainly made up for the lack of food we had in the boats.

"We had practically the same experience related by Captain Chapman. We reached land two days after he did, as we got into equally weather which made things worse for us. Those were terrible days and nights, but they are over now. Second Mate Collins and the other men have returned to New Zealand and we come here to get paid off, as this is the port we shipped from."

This was not First Mate Hatfield's first experience in an open boat. Several years ago he was with the crew that abandoned the British bark Hadington in the Bay of Bengal after the vessel took fire. The men spent five days in the boats and suffered great hardships before they reached shore.

The members of the Puritan's crew arriving on the Aorangi were: Boatswain H. Carlson, Carpenter C. Peterson and Seamen W. Anderson, C. Anderson, John Johnson, S. Peterson, C. Johnson, William Duvel, Fritz Grossawake, Frank Gustavson and William Marshall.

Logan Next Transport.

San Francisco Chronicle, August 17. —The transport Buford, which arrived Tuesday from the Philippines, will return to her resting place in Mission Bay, which she occupied for some time before making the voyage which she has just completed. The Logan will take the September sailing to the islands, leaving here in the 5th of next month. She has been on the dry dock at Mare Island, being cleaned and painted and placed in condition for the service again.

Aorangi Still Breaks Down.

Many people will wonder when the management
